

EMERGING THREATS IN THE FOOD SYSTEM Shaun Kennedy, National Center for Food Protection

Naturally occurring, human induced and intentional threats to the food system are changing the threat environment to the food system and thus the potential mitigation strategies and technology needs to address those threats. This talk will provide a background on our current capabilities to manage food safety and food defense threats and then explore some emerging threats and their implications.